NEGRO SUPERSTITION.

AFRICAN FETTERISM SOFTENED BY CONTACT WITH CIVILIZATION.

Charms Worn for Protection Against the Evil One—The Belief in Witches and "Conjur Niggers"—Signs Portending Death—Various Laid-on Fictions.

The contact of the African with a mighty civilization, and today his superstition is of a different fiber. He is a firm believer in a personal devil, and accepts him with all time honored stage properties—horns, tail, cloven foot and red hot pitchfork. For protection against this awful one the negro wears the greatest number of charms. To ward off his familiar wiles, every negro nailed against his door a horseshoe. This charm, however, had no power unless it had been accidentally found. The "white folks as do big house" were often presented with one of these wiles, and if they failed to use it, the giver, sitting and comfortably, nailed it somewhere on a "mafter" post.

Old negro nurses teach their charges that the tangles which after a night's sleep are apt to appear in the hair are knotted by witches, and everybody in the southern states is familiar with the darkest belief that a witch will ride her broomstick in the dead of night, exhausting the strength of the victim.

To ward off the approach of any of the foul sisterhood silver dimes and five cent pieces with a hole in them, strung on a cord and suspended from the neck, are unrivaled. Odds and ends of bones strung together, and blessed by "conjur priests," constitute a Gri gri, which is a magic charm, and is worn by the Evil One. In southern Louisiana there are large numbers of negroes who believe that certain other negroes have come with Satan, receiving from him a liberal endowment of his diabolical powers. These are known as "conjur niggers," who can "hou-doo" you. To incur the ill will of one of them is a grievous misfortune.

As every negro, even the most deluded, is sure of salvation, and speaks with confidence of his place in heaven, when he will "rest at some table of white folks," it is not strange that he revels in signs portending death. His heaven, like the Mohammedan's, is one of sensual delights, and conjur and fictions are to him a great joy. To put a black pin into a child's dress, to try on any of his mourning garments, to open an umbrella in the house, to break a looking glass, to carry a spindle through the house, are all signs of death. To drive a nail into the wall, except in making a coffin, will bring death, and a man so unfortunate as to bury three wives will bury six. A spider seen in the morning brings good luck; at noon, disappointment; and in the evening, bad luck.

If accidentally a garment be put on wrong side out, and it be worn that way until noon, and then turned, the wearer will have good luck. To give a knife or scissors to a friend is to sever friendship, except, indeed, a bent pin be given in return, which averts the impending rupture. The Roman Catholic negroes of southern Louisiana will not cut a banana cross, because through its center runs a dark streak, which the cross itself prevents the appearance of a cross. To avoid this sacrilege the fruit must be broken.

They accept the Bible literally, and as they receive it in most grotesque form from their "preachers," it is little wonder that their conception of things spiritual is distorted. With one exception, the negroes will not eat the chickens from a neighbor's hen roost, the tidbits from his pen, the melons from his "patch," but cannot be induced to commit the unpardonable sin of eating a dove.

If a black cat enters your house you will receive money; as the dog denotes the coming of a storm, and the cat denotes the coming of a storm, you will receive money; as the dog denotes the coming of a storm, and the cat denotes the coming of a storm, you will receive money.

WHAT MAKES THE SUMMER?

It is not the bird's clear tone. Clearing the morning air with a soaring cry. Nor the nightingale's dulcet melody all the balmy night.

Not these alone. Make the sweet sounds of summer. But the drone of beetle and bee, the murmurous hum of the fly.

And the chirp of the cricket hidden out of sight. These help to make the summer.
